Nifty circuit design	Internal	Passing Juice
I installed these brackets from Renogy. This was one of the most time consuming steps. I probably should have increased the pitch on these for optimal sunshine.	Internal	Passing Juice
Positioning the (4) 100 watt solar panels.	Internal	Passing Juice
I decided to run wires for each solar panel rather than wiring them in series. To save money, I bought the cheapest glands I could find, these did not come with screws or sealant. I ran	Internal	Passing Juice

10 AWG wire through the glands and sealed the roof entry with black roofing caulk. Then applied the roofing caulk to the plastic body and screwed it down. I installed standard MC4 solar panel connectors, these are crimped and soldered.
I decided to have the glands positioned underneath the panels to provide optimal protection from the elements and a cleaner look. Having another set of MC4 connectors here also makes it easy to change panels or reconfigure my setup later on.	Internal	Passing Juice

The wires from the roof drop in like this. I used simple cable tacks to secure them. I split the positive and negative wires to run along separate boards.	Internal	Passing Juice
Working off of my initial circuit design, I worked up the placement of the components on the main power panel. Solar would come in on the top and the batteries would be connected to the bottom.	Internal	Passing Juice
These busbars were some of the most expensive components but worked very nicely for my application.	Internal	Passing Juice
I ran ground wires along the backside to ground the components and mounting bolts. These connect to the MPPT controller, inverter, and later on a grounding rod.	Internal	Passing Juice
The main power panel is installed on the wall. The positive solar power leads run to a 35 Amp breaker before continuing to the 60 Amp MPPT charge controller.	Internal	Passing Juice
MPPT up close.	Internal	Passing Juice
At the base of this system are six 6 Volt lead acid batteries. I wired the batteries in series creating three 12 Volt battery banks and then wired them in parallel on the main power panel busbars.	Internal	Passing Juice
I used 2 AWG copper wire and crimped on lugs for for the batteries and inverter leads.	Internal	Passing Juice
I can now easily power my iMac, power my soldering iron, charge my drill batteries, charge my lawn mower battery, and power my LED lighting.	Internal	Passing Juice
