- [H4] Recent studies have brought to light the serious health issues caused by toxic diesel emissions including cardiovascular and respiratory conditions like asthma and bronchitis, and diseases like emphysema, lung cancer and heart disease. The ones who suffer the most are children, the elderly, and families living next to freeways and busy distribution corridors. In fact, the Ports in Los Angeles are known as the Diesel Death Zone.
- [H4] Europe embraced diesel in a big way 25 years ago and is paying a heavy price today. The air over some of its largest cities is so bad that on some days, all vehicle use is restricted. Their citizens are suing municipalities and federal governments for the bad health caused by the polluted air from heavy use of diesel.
- [H4] That is why London, Paris, Madrid, Mexico City, Stuttgart and other cities around the world have set dates to ban the use of diesel.

- [H4] The air in Southern California continues to be the worst in the U.S. and much of the smog-forming emissions are caused by the tens of thousands of trucks that move in and out of the Ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach every day. The Commissions of the Ports are considering joining the ban on diesel and are setting aggressive zero emissions goals for the future, driving transportation's inevitable move to clean alternatives.
- [H4] Some strategic trucking companies around the U.S. are already moving to clean alternatives that meet zero emissions standards and their bottom line. Shouldn't more of the trucks that provide the critical function of moving all of our goods around the country make the switch?
